The representatives were either permanent or temporary, depending on the corporations which they represented. For example, Chemapol and Kovo had permanent representatives, whereas Ligna and the leather industries only sent representatives when the occasion demanded it. Towards the end of 1950 there was talk of uniting these representatives and placing them under Kietrich, then Czechoslovak Commerc Counsellor in Warsaw. This proved impracticable because of accommodation difficulties. There was no office building large enough to accommodate the various offices dispersed through the city. The Protocol Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs took the matter in hand, but no solution had been reached by December 1951. 3. There is no de jure relationship between CMEA (Council for Mutual Economic Aid) and the inter-satellite councils in Warsaw. However, Henryk Rozanski, the Polish representative in CMEA, consults with Eugenuisz Szyr and the Polish-Czech Council whenever he comes to Warsaw. Instructions on commercial agreements and other matters issued by CMEA were always transmitted through Rozanski or the State Planning Commission. They were issued independently of any intersatellite council for economic collaboration. 4. Rozanski's staff in Moscow includes some members of the Polish Embassy Commercial Department. He has very few immediate collaborators. A certain Mordzinski
